After finding out her mother has melanoma and realizing how empty she feels in her current life, Chelsea decides to take a road trip with her mother back to the commune to reconnect with her mother and the people she knew from that other life. All right, there's probably a couple of "spoilers" in here, but I tried to leave it vague.

Dharma Girl, essentially, is a book about finding one's identity. Although the book alludes that this goal was finally ascertained by Chelsea, you never really feel that way. I think maybe Chelsea wrote this novel too soon after the events in this narrative occurred, because it came across as a rough draft.
